Jim Garner Unveils His New Line of Prison Attire Guaranteed to House an Entire Cell Block With Plenty of Room to Spare

Red is in...stripes are out. Striped prison uniforms commonly used in the 19th century were abolished in the United States early in the 20th century because their continued use as a badge of shame was considered undesirable. Fair treatment of prisoners and a growing number of non-violent, working class offenders prompted such a change in attitudes, and clothing and conditions changed to serve the concept of rehabilitation rather than punishment. As a result, work clothes were introduced, perhaps because of the concept of honest labor helping to turn an inmate into an honest citizen.

Jim Garner, quick to pick up on the current trend, manufactures RED uniforms. Not only are they red, they are huge...and economical. One uniform can cover an entire prison cell block, thus saving the government millions of dollars in clothing costs. Jim said he is thinking about manufacturing pink underwear to go with the uniforms. Neat idea! That should reduce the testosterone level of the most harden criminal.

“Have you heard that we may soon be getting pink underwear to go with our red prison uniform? Personally I would have preferred lavender, but pink is not a bad choice. I look good in either color. What color would have been your preference?”
